Reasons for Allowance

In reference to newly amended claim 27:

Stefik et al. (Figure 1) discloses a method of transferring a digital data file comprising:

- Connecting a digital data player or a memory of the digital data player to a communications network via a first personal computer, where the digital data player is Repository 1, and where the first personal computer is the system from which the creator uploads his or her digital work. (Figure 1, Items 101, 102)
- Downloading a digital data file with an attached code segment from the communication network to the memory of the digital data player, where the digital data file is the digital work that the creator creates, and where the file is downloaded into the memory of the first repository and stored there.(Figure 1, Items 101, 102) & (page 3, lines 50-58)
- Connecting the digital data player or the memory of the digital data player to a second personal computer, different than the first personal computer, where the digital data player is the first repository, and the second personal computer is repository 2. (Figure 1, Items 103, 104 et seq.)
- Initiating an upload request to upload the digital data file from the memory of the digital data player to the second personal computer (Figure 1, Items 107, 108)

Art Unit: 2134

- Reading the code segment attached to the digital data file, where the code segment of the file is the usage rights. (Figure 1, Items 105)
- Controlling whether or not the uploading of the digital data file is permitted to occur based upon software interpreting the code segment. (Figure 1, Items 105-108)

While Stefik et al. fails to explicitly disclose the embodiment where repository 1 is a digital player, it is understood that both repository 1 and repository 2 are computers with processors and memory, running an operating system. (page 7, line 25 – page 8, line 25). It is well known in the art that computers typically come equipped with them a basic player for digital media. For Example, the ubiquitous Microsoft windows™ has packaged with it two programs called notepad and wordpad, which allow the rendering or “playing” of text files. It also has a media player which allows for the playing of digital music files, and internet explorer which allow images to be viewed. Additionally Stefik et al. discloses with it, a type of repository called a “rendering repository” which allow for the digital works of Stefik et al. (music, video, images, text) to be rendered or “played.” (Figure 2), page 4(lines 15-20, and lines 40- 58) & page 5(lines 1-10)

Stefik et al. (page 4, lines 40-45) teaches “A rendering system is generally defined as a system comprising a repository and a rendering device which can render a digital work into its desired form”

Stefik however fails to disclose

- uploading software from the digital data player to the second personal computer.
- Reading the code segment attached to the digital data file using the uploaded software in the second personal computer;
- Controlling whether or not the uploading of the digital data file is permitted to occur based upon the uploaded software in the second personal computer interpreting the code segment.

A search of the prior art has uncovered Stefik, EP 0715247A1 as the closest art of record.

No art disclosing, nor motivation to combine has been found which recites the limitation of uploading software from the digital data player to the second personal computer. Indeed in the art of content distribution and management, it is most prevalent to upload and download the media files, while the software itself is typically installed to a personal computer through a CD or uploaded to the computer from an external server. Additionally, the installation of the software is a separate transaction in itself, distinct from a method of transferring a digital data file as recited in the preamble to claim 27.

Claim 40 recites similar amendments and is allowable for the same reasons.

All other pending claims are dependent upon allowable claims 27 and 40 and are allowable for that reason.
